MELAN the uyo the Louisvill The Love of Life.

BY LIBIA JANE PIERSON.

Where the river deep was flowing, Where the summer sun was glowing, Where the aweetest buds were blowing; Stood a maiden, little I nowing . What life had in store: Little knowing, little earing, What the future was preparing: Young life's beauty she was wearing, Nature's joy and music sharing-Could she ask for more?

She knew not that calmly sleeping; With his wings of fragrance sweeping O'er the deep down well of weeping, From her heart all knowledge keeping

Of its presence there: Still his balmy breathing blending, With his murmured sobs escending And a light of glory lending Where its mists pale flowers are bending, Lay an angel fair.

On his brow lay lily flowers Breathing peace on all the hours; And thereses of love's bowers, Drooping with the heart's warm showers, Bloom'd upon his breast: O'er his form Hope's bow is shining, With his locks her buds are twining, And her magical designing, Hues of Heaven and Earth combining, Draped his place of rest.

She knew not-but by the river Dreamed of bliss that life should give her, As the wavelets dance and shiver, g as it flows; She knew not those waves were keeping Strange and fearful mysteries sleeping, Where the dead that hear no weeping, Lie where long dark sea-weeds sweeping, Curtain there repose.

When the summer flowers were dying, When the plaintive winds were sighing, When the latest birds were flying, And the sere and full'n leaves lying By the river's shore. We beheld a lady straying, In her silken, rich arraying; Gold and dazzling gems displaying: Yet her famished heart was praying

For the beautiful believing, Ignorant of all deceiving, Faith in God and man inweaving, With assurance of achieving Pure and glorious things; Ere life's wisdom did awaken, Ere the earnest truth was shaken, And her bosom's fine forsaken By the angel, who had taken Heavenward on his wings.

For the faith of yore.

And her unveil'd heart was aching At the holy one's fersaking, While the bitter will unbreaking On its altar stone was slaking All the pure fires theret She has asted every pleasure

From an overflowing measure, Here were fame, and power, and treasure! But her wealth, and pride and leisure, Oh, how vain they werel

And life's brilliant falsehoods spurning With her heart and spirit burning With intensely painful yearning O'er the wasted past: Beorning all that life had taught her,

Now, to childhood's haunts returning,

All the pomp that wealth had brought her, All the bliss that love had wrought her Since they every one had brought her
